tional institutions, among them Central College, but he had never been a teacher except in a law school in which he lectured.

"Do you know the plaintiff?"

"I do."

First Meeting with the Plaintiff

"When did you first meet her?"

"In the Spring of 1884. It was a cold morning on a train between Lexington and Frankfort. I had an overcoat and the back seat of the car, and as I passed

"When I was able to get it, he accused me of being a thief. I was so angry, I suppose I ought to know you, but you people grow up so on us we forget their faces. She said, 'I am Madeline Breckinridge Pollard,' that her father had been killed by a man who had been with a boy he would have named after me." C. As it was, he gave her the middle name of Breckinridge. She said it was going to be a sister, who was dirty and mischievous. I expressed my sympathy and said, "I am glad."

"When did you next meet her?"

"I do not remember exactly. I received a letter from her. I have lost the letter, but the substance of it was a question of money. She had no college on some business of great importance to her. The substance of my

"Did you receive another letter?"
"I did."

That Disputed Letter Again.

"Is this the letter?" asked Mr. Buttsworth, handing up the black-bordered epistle, which the plaintiff leniently received.

"It would be affection for me to assume that. I am familiar with it."

This provoked a tilt over the letter. Mr. Wilson contending that it had been proven to have come from Mr. Butterworth and Mr. Butterworth assuring that unless he could prove the

"The plaintiff," he began, referring always to Miss Pollard by the latter term, "the plaintiff said, I suppose you were surprised to receive such a letter from a school teacher. She responded that perhaps she over-exaggerated the importance of the matter. It," she said, "but all this time you standing," and invited me to take

"Now we propose," said Mr. Butt, "to offer this letter to the jury that they may examine it and compare it with the admitted specimens of plaintiff's handwriting in evidence. Even if we had produced no expert testimony on the point, under the ruling of the Supreme Court it would be permissible."

Singularly enough, the ruling which the attorney proceeded to quote was the great namesake of the president, Justice Bradley, of the United States Supreme Court.

Glad to Pause and Rest.

As the argument was taken up by Breckinridge sank back into a chair, apparently glad of an opportunity fect. His face was flushed, and when his towering head was quickly roved over the waiting audience, Polk's eyes went beyond her to the background of sagging men but for the most part kept his face turned towards the judge. He glanced forward with right hand resting on his knee, his left arm on his elbow on Judge Bradley's desk, a foot above the level of the worn wooden bench. His tones were mellifluous and alive but not abnormally tranquilous as he dealt with the incidents of his early life. A wave of snowy hair swept carelessly over his forehead, the beard beneath was carefully trimmed; a small black mustache, a few white hairs, expanded shirt front of glittering white, the lapels of his black cutaway coat were flung open. ## SUMMONS FOR PAXTON.

Must Answer for Failing to File
the Certificate.

Lawyer Steinert, counsel to the Housing Department this morning procured summons from the Seventh Judicial Court to be served on Rev. John Paxton, who neglected to file in specified time with the Health Department, the marriage certificate of C. Brockbridge and Mrs. Wing. Judge Keen issued the summons. The counsel for the Health Department will hold the summons for execution until 10 o'clock. Paxton returns to the city.

Lawyer Stelnert holds that Dr. Paxton will have to pay a $10 fine. If he should fail to pay it a body execution will be issued.
